Fishing in the St. Lawrence among the Thousand Islands" is thus described in Thousand Islands is thus described in the National Repository: In pike-troll-ing here, stout ash rods, made in a single piece about eight feet in length, are used; and these are set in supports and stand out one from each side of the skiff, thus spreading the lines to prevent fouling of hooks. It seems a lazy way to fish, and many prefer to hold the rods in the hand in order to feel the heavy strike of the game. But the old fisherman will tell you that the regular oscill-tory motion of the spoon hooks, under the impulse of the oars, best imitates the movements of living bait, and that the solid strike of the rod bait, and that the solid strike of the rod lying in the support is surest to hook the fish firmly. Flying fish for bass has been neglected here for several years past, though formerly it was much in vogue. Dr. Bethune and his sportsman friends of former years preferred this, and right-ly, to any other form of fishing on the river; and there are some famous stories lingering here vet concerning their ex-ploits with fly and reel rod. Charles S. Brooks, of New York, a member of the Bethune Club, bass fishing here, took five bass at a cast for three successive casts and four at the fourth cast, making nineteen fine fish in four successive
